Q: Does closing 'Save' or 'Discard Changes' on the FF checkout page also remove the need to submit form? Say I have a form that I can submit by pressing 'Save' or 'Discard Changes'. Say I submit this form and change some data in the meantime. I then go to the checkout page and click 'Discard Changes'. In the new browser window, I don't have to fill in anything again. My question is, does that mean I can save a revision of this checkout page without having to submit the form again? A: You are correct, it does. If you read the help page, I quote: If you navigate away from the last revision while it is open in your browser, you can reload the page by clicking the Redo button. If you decide you want to keep the changes that were made, click the Back arrow to return to your last revision and click Save. If you save the page and then reopen it, it will revert to the last saved revision. Well this is embarrassing. Needless to say, the Indian economy is set for a pretty rough landing. Current estimates show that the economy will slow down at a pace of 6.5% for the next three quarters. This is down from 7.9% recorded in Q2 2017. In fact, GDP growth is set to be at its weakest post-reform period since April 2014, when the economy was in the midst of the demonetisation controversy. To make matters worse, the US Federal Reserve, which has long been a staunch supporter of the Indian economy (India being the US's largest trading partner) has warned that the Indian economy may suffer from the uncertainties of the Trump administration. Shrinking Sensex to 7-month low The downfall of the Indian rupee on Wall Street has resulted in a 30-40 basis point depreciation of the rupee, which has reduced the value of Indian exports and has lowered the competitiveness of the Indian economy. While the official data for Q2 2017 showed that the exports by the Indian economy expanded by 7.6% on a quarter-on-quarter basis, the latest data suggest that the rates have contracted at a much sharper pace of -4.1%

QoQ. Thus, on a yearly basis, the export growth was at 4.9% in Q2 2017 compared to 5.

Specific up-regulation of phosphoenolpyruvate carboxylase gene expression by phenolic acids in transgenic tobacco plants overexpressing the plant specific transcription factor PtaMYB8. Transcription factors play an important role in various biological processes. PtaMYB8 was shown to be a negative regulator in the shikimate pathway in tomato. Phenolic acids (PA) were suggested to regulate the phenylpropanoid biosynthetic pathway through activating the expression of several key genes involved in this pathway. In this study, we found that elevated level of phenolic acids increased the transcription of phenylalanine ammonia-lyase (PAL) and lignin biosynthetic genes. PAL activity and lignin content were also increased. Although the overexpression of PtaMYB8 induced the expression of shikimate pathway genes, PA treatment did not further enhance the induction of the shikimate pathway genes and PA decreased the expression of shikimate pathway genes. PA treatment also increased the expression of phosphoenolpyruvate carboxylase (PEPC). Treatment of tobacco leaves with three different PA improved GUS activity of tobacco phosphoenolpyruvate carboxylase (PEPC) promoter and the specific induction of PEPC was shown by Northern blotting. In addition, the transient transformation of tobacco BY-2 cells with a PEPC promoter fused to a GUS reporter gene indicated that the induced expression of PEPC by PA was not just restricted to leaves. The effect of PA on PEPC gene expression was also confirmed in our PtaMYB8 overexpression lines. Furthermore, PA up-regulated the expression of PEPC in Arabidopsis leaves in a similar manner. Our results suggest that increased level of PA could stimulate the shikimate pathway through specifically up-regulating PEPC gene expression. A survey of job aids to help acute-care nurses implement protocols for resuscitation of an individual with an out-of-hospital cardiac arrest. To describe current use of job aids by nurses and associated perceived barriers to their use. A computer-based survey of the state-wide membership of the Minnesota chapter of the American Association of Critical-Care Nurses. Descriptive analysis of job aid use by type and frequency, barriers to job aid use, and characteristics of job aids used. One hundred twenty-five nurses working in acute care participated in the study. Most nurses perceived the need for job aids to informally communicate
